TRAVELETTE

Tripoli. Tripoli is the real east. Here is no admixture of the European element. It is a city of snowy domes and minarets and flat white roofs spotched here and there with the fluttering color of dry-ing clothes at the bathhouses. It is framed in the rich green of a great oasis, and beyond the palm trees lies a wind-wrinkled desert, than which there is no more desolate in the world.

ranging from the proud Tunisian Arabs and Bedouins to the ebon-black, oily. shining Sudanese. And all of Tripoli's ways are typical of the far east, too. ways are typical of the far east, too. When you land, a mob of viliainous-looking cutthroats captures your baggage and carries it to the customhouse, where a suave, bemedaled and pompous-looking officer passes it unopened in consideration of a few francs.

Twice a week there is a market day at Tripoil. It is held in the yellow sand along the shore. All of the day before caravans come trailing in—long lines of laden camels, horses, mules and donkeys. The merchants squat each in his allotted place, and although there is much haggling and laughter, everything is done in good order. The largest business is done in live stock and in grass and straw, which are costly commodities in that waterless country.

Black Sudanese women sell multi-colored baskets, haggling and cheating with great good nature, and shrieking with laughter when they sell you a basket for four times its value. A Sudanese devil dancer, dressed in a skin decorated with human bones, draws a dense crowd by his wild cavortings. An Arab doctor sells prescriptions for a penny each; his entire equipment is paper and pen and sand by way of a blotter. The patients eat the prescriptions and go away greatly cheered.

by way of a blotter. The patients eat the prescriptions and go away greatly cheered.

From the town you walk away in the oasis, which is eight square miles of palms and flowers, kept alive in the desert by water drawn from wells. Camels, treading back and forth on a little track, raise the water in goatskin vessels, so that it splashes into wooden troughs, from which it is carried by little ditches to the thirsty trees. In the oasis all is stillness and beauty, save for the ceaseless whine and splash of these primitive pumps. Beyond the edge of the cool, black shadow, the gray desert trembles in the shimmer of merciless heat. But as evening comes the slanting light touches it with glowing color, and, at the same time, it becomes alive. A goat herder appears from nowhere, with a slow-moving flock creeping across the dunes toward the village. A caravan appears silhouetted against the red west, every line distinct as an etching. As they near the longed-for oasianther is no quickening of the pace, no sign of haste or joy. The cameis stand scornful and unperturbed; the drivers pause to drink from the plashing noriahs. Allah has granted them safe return once more.

A Boom for the Bald.

From the Pittsburgh Gasette.

The announcement by Chicago's new mayor that he is seeking a baldheaded attorney for the position of corporation counsel, paying $10,000 a year, should put a crimp in the sale year, should put a crimp in the sale of hair restorers and bring gladness to the large and increasing brotherhood of the polished domes. In the opinion of Mayor Thompson, which is shared by many other intelligent persons, baldness frequently indicates brains of a superior order, experience, dignity and the judicial mind. But there are other reasons for the popular esteem in which the bald-headed citizen is held. A medical theory not without acceptation suggests that unusual intellectual exertion, long continued, is inimical to the growth of the hair. Therefore, the man who has delved deeply in the intricacles of the law is apt to be deficient in, if not absolutely destitute of, hirsute adornment. Evidently there is ample support for Mayor Thompson's position on this question, which may not win him the barber vote, should he run again, but will entitle him to the thanks and admiration of many fellow citizens who, contemplating their domes of thought, long ago paraphrased for their own use the touching sentiment,
"There is no parting there."

The Earlier Start. From the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Cleveland was taken severely to task by the provincial press a year ago when the city council presumed to "monkey with the hands of the clock" by adopting eastern time. The Ohio State Journal declared it was "a sort of device made to assist the weak-minded in getting an earlier start in
